

Abstract.

An in-expensive method to join metals or other materials by a slug that is compressed or clinched into a punched or machined substantially rectangular slot in two adjoining pieces.

The final assembly is flat and of the same thickness as the clinched material.

5 It could be used to advantage in a mitered frame type assembly.